FOREWORD

Totalitarian government is not confined to forcing everyone to vote for the same dictator, or go to the same church. It involves also the elimination of liberty to choose your food and drink, choose your remedy for disease, choose your own poison drug in which you may have confidence.

Here we may see the consequences of the regimentation of our people into the universal use of fluorine added to our water supply. Those who do not want it are given no choice but to pay twice for what they once were taxed for.

Truly, as Herbert Spencer remarked a hundred years ago, "Proponents of reforms are often so absorbed in observing the action of their proposals that they forget to look for the reaction."

If the reaction in the human is to be the same as the reaction to the test animal, as reported in this book, some of us had better make preparations to migrate to a new world, like our forefathers, to escape the dire consequences of the same arbitrary totalitarian arrogance that tells us that we must be regimented into faceless and helpless victims of whatever unwarranted and ill-considered freak experiments that the minds of power-drunk bureaucrats can devise. All regardless of the constitutional rights of the individual, or of the criminal nature of experiments upon the victims without their consent.
